Here is an interesting article from the Louisville Courier-Journal. It comes under the head of "Tall Stories," and may be taken with several grains of salt.

Dr. R. C. McBride, of Orange, Va. probably drives the queerest team ever put to harness since that golden day when young Phæton ran away with his father's celestial outfit and set the world on fire. The doctor says:

"I was given by a friend living on Chesapeake bay a pair of wild geese, and from them raised eleven the first year, five of which were ganders. I com-menced training these five ganders as soon as hatched by driving them about the yard tied together, and soon got them so I could guide them with per-fect ease. I then made for them a harness, consisting of a piece of leather to fit over the breast and top of the neck. The traces were fastened to that on either side and held in place by a thin strap that encircled the entire body in front of the wings. The traces then ioined each other eighteen inches behind the goose and were fastened to the end of a cross bar made fast in the centre to a strap which represented the pole or tongue of the weight to be drawn, they being hitched like a five-horse team, and held together by a little strap being joined onto the two collars of the geese op-posite each other. I then constructed a little wagon and began teaching them to draw it, which they did with but little trouble, pulling easily, after they were one year old, thirty pounds apiece, or 150 pounds.

"There is a lake near my place over a mile in circumference, and I have for them a light skiff of tin, weighing only twenty-eight pounds, and began boat riding by letting them draw me over the water by swimming. Then I com-menced teaching them to fly, and in a few days I could skim over the wa-ter at the rate of one mile a minute. It is an experience never to be forgotten and something to be perfectly en-joyed. I can guide them with perfect ease and have them as much under my control as a pair of gentle horses.

"Last winter I made of light, well seasoned wood a little frame with steel runners-a tricycle sleigh-and made mile and a quarter per minute on the ice, riding in a circle. The feeling of going at that rate through the open air is something grand and wonderful. The wind whistling by your ears like a tornado, causing the tears to flow thick and fast, made it necessary for me to use a glass over my face to keep from

"I am now completing a balloon, ob long in shape, that will just bear my weight, and intend visiting the World's Fair in September, making an aerial trip, and will there exhibit my team by flying in a circle over the fair grounds.

A Mania for Beefsteak.

A lank Irishman, with a bronzed face and the clothing of a backwoodsman, came into a little German hotel, in New York, just before midnight on Saturday, paid for a night's lodging and went to bed. He registered as "John Hall." He came downstairs at noon Sunday and said he was hungry.
"I'll have a beefsteak and some whisky," he said to the proprietor's wife. He swallowed the whisky after dispatching the steak.

"Some Vermouth and another steak," he said, as he paid for the first one. He ate the second steak with a relish PLASTER.

Mrs. Henssing, the proprietor's wife, opened her eyes, but served the order. Twenty minutes clapsed, and then the guest called to Mrs. Hensing for the fourth time. "That steak was so good I'll have to try another," he said.

There was a commotion among the other guests when the tall Irishman fished up another installment of silver for the fourth steak.
"I guess I'll have a little more steak."

he said, as he stroked his waistband with an air of increasing comfort. Proprietor Henssing came in as the last of the fifth steak went out of sight.

"Now I'll have another whisky," said the stranger, producing the cash. But Proprietor Henssing demurred. "No, you had better take water after that lunch," he suggested.

"Oh, very well, just as you choose," said the man of hunger, and then he began to sing. The proprietor suggested that he take a little nap. The man went upstairs and booming echoes came down the staircase. Other lodgers came down one after another and ers came down one after another and put in vigorous protests against the
